Career Personality and Aptitude Tests

Taking a career test is a little like playing "what do you want to be when you grow up?" with a twist. The twist is that career tests can give you ideas about what you possibly should do rather than you simply pondering what you want to do. A personality test can give you an indication of which jobs match your personality type and which careers you may have an aptitude for. You do need to remember that the test results are only an indicator and should not be relied on as an absolute assessment of which career is best for you.

Evaluating your goals and life style can provide insight into what types of jobs you are best suited for. You may also get some information on career options that you hadn't even thought of before. Also some of the tests are actually fun to take. If nothing else, you will gain information on potential careers that you can explore to see if they really are a good fit.

A variety of career tests are available online. Some are complicated, others are quick and easy. There are fees for some assessments, others are free. Start with the free tests to see how they work for you. Then consider the more in-depth analysis provided by the top rated assessment instruments like Myers-Briggs Type Indicator, the Strong Interest Inventory or the Keirsey Temperment Sorter which do charge a fee for products and services but may be well worth the investment.

Directory of online general and career personality tests.

Here's what I discovered about my personality and careers. Monster decided I was "cautious, conservative and quiet; literal, realistic and practical, careful and precise; logical, honest and matter of fact" which is a pretty close fit. Princeton Review selected "college administrator" as one of my career options. That one was interesting because it's exactly what I do at my day job. Some of the other options, like anthropologist or curator are jobs that I would have an interest in doing. Then there was the Color Quiz which told me that I have "considerable stress," need to "stand out from the herd" and I'm "making the best of things." I'm not quite sure about that one!

When you're exploring career options, it's worth taking some time to get some suggestions on what career might be right for you. Then spend time researching the options to discover if you really have found the career that's right for you
